"THE MASTER POWER"
SUCCESSFUL DRAMA

Those plays are successful—those of the serious drama—which are in a bold and fearless manner some condition of society or the world of business or affairs as it is found at the moment.

There have had plays of the market, plays of the half-world, plays of society, plays of American progress, plays of western development, the farm and plays of the city, and in one condition as a condition among dramatists of the present-day status of the world, the relation of whites and blacks under the new regime of equality. Obviously, there are bold, startling dramatic conditions there which have baffled most novelists and have defied all dramatic pens for adequate and at the same time artistic expression.

Just such a play—a powerful, tremendously human and unequivocal stage document—is Alfred Allen's "The Master Power," which will be seen at the Duncan on April 1.

Mr. Allen is a young writer, who leaped into national fame quite suddenly last year, as the winner of the famous "Town Topics" $1,000 prize for the best American drama. There were competitors from every state in the union, and the judges represented a consensus of the foremost dramatic opinion in New York. The prize was unanimously awarded to Mr. Allen.

At that time his play was called "Chivalry," but "The Master Power" has since been taken as a more expressive name of the crying conditions of the present south that it so vividly sets forth. No novel and no play of recent years contains so actual and strikingly grouped a picture of these conditions. Through it all Mr. Allen carries the tense thread of a gripping human story, working up his dramatic climaxes with the skill of a true craftsman of the theater.
